

I have a simple solution. I'll remove the device and do what I want with the signals I receive on MY television. If Viacom wishes to make their own brand of crippled television, I will be quite happy to NOT buy it. However, I will also be quite happy to ignore and work around any FCC regulation that allows a media giant to have enough control over the manufacture of all televisions. It's a conflict of interests because it will in short order lead to much more mass media control over the lives of the body politic. Do I think that the FCC would stand for that kind of market manipulation? Of course I do, they're in the process of doing it with this very regulation.